Rust or Go Missing by Lily Brown

Lily Brown

The poems in Lily Brown's Rust or Go Missing exist within the liminal area among the literal and the imagined, the rational and the irrational, the summary and the representational. They believe themselves into being, and in so doing, develop into not only reflections on lived and imagined experience, yet reviews in themselves.

Finely crafted with a few actually attractive traces and nice leaps. They're additionally super-cerebral, which I suppose is more or less renowned immediately in contemporary American poetry, yet is usually in my opinion tough for me to get a toehold on. Flipping again through, I spotted the poems that resonate so much with me are the fewer cerebrally dense ones. The place a few emotion slips in, there is extra at stake-- a few gesture at heartache vs. thought-ache-- larger rigidity that I might prefer to see a piece of Rust or Go Missing extra of, like during this one-- Sitting within the Car Swallows Rust or Go Missing fall from wire, silver tribute to the sun--who comes here? Deer-faced cows Rust or Go Missing within the open range. The black poultry tucks her wings. Swallows fall from wire. We pass. Sideways, we are bodies; one dimension, being moved. Wow, this one kills me. "Transference" too. ("I am staring at TV. we predict too much/ from each one other...")
