The Mirror of Kong Ho by Ernest Bramah

Ernest Bramah

This vigorous and fun set of stories, built as a chain of letters facing the eccentricities and eccentricities of the West, are purportedly via Kong Ho, a Chinese language guy vacationing early twentieth century London. Those letters, addressed to his homeland, check with the Westerners in London as barbarians and reinterpret many parts of contemporary lifestyles (such as the motor vehicle and the piano) with the wit, knowledge and wry humor that suffuses the simplest of Bramah's Oriental works.

Drolly a laugh set of spoof letters despatched from a hugely bemused Chinaman sojourning among the English barbarians within The Mirror of Kong Ho the first decade of the nineteenth century to his respected father again home, to be able to coming to grips with their inferior culture, which he singularly fails to do, with a lot 'loss of gravity'. Kong Ho is an unfailingly modest chap, bearing on himself dismissively as 'this person' while moving into all manner of misunderstandings, comparable to by chance insulting his hosts, being arrested and cooking a puppy to provoke a tender woman who had stuck his eye. His interpretation of the character of cricket, a 'barbarian game of jumping insects', is especially funny. Bramah evidently knew Chinese language tradition well, and although this can be a piss-take you could inform that he revered it to, with the lack of knowledge of the English to the real nature of the Oriental being simply as a lot the objective of his satire. I actually cherished the ever-ready litany of sayings which Kong Ho dispenses to The Mirror of Kong Ho common befuddlement in any given situation, similar to those two: "The sagacious fowl doesn't The Mirror of Kong Ho construct his nest two times within the empty soup-tureen." "There is just one guy who knew with exact simple task what a maiden's subsequent perspective might be, and he died younger of surprise." Wise words.
