Lesley Higgins

"Cult of ugliness," Ezra Pound's phrase, powerfully summarizes the ways that modernists reminiscent of Pound, T. S. Eliot, Wyndham Lewis, and T. E. Hulme—the self-styled "Men of 1914"—responded to the "horrid or sordid or disgusting" stipulations of modernity by means of considerably altering aesthetic idea and literary practice. In simple terms the illustration of "ugliness," they protested, could produce the new, actually "beautiful" paintings of art. They dissociated the gorgeous from its conventional embodiment in girl beauty, and from its organization with Walter Pater and Oscar Wilde. Their cultivation of ugliness displaced misogyny and homophobia. Higgins takes in texts reminiscent of John Ruskin's artwork criticism, Eliot's literary journalism, Lewis's pro-fascism pamphlets, and the poetry of Pound, Conrad Aiken, and Langston Hughes. She demonstrates that even energetic champions of attractiveness have been dedicated to aesthetic practices that disempowered girl figures to be able to articulate new truths of male inventive mastery.
